Constructed of bleached koa, this modern bar has a soft, flowing, organic wood grain panel wrapping the back wall, with lighted display niches. The ceiling panel supports a custom-made minimal box light fixture. The balance of the functional cabinetry consists of dark mahogany, with stone work surfaces. The stone wall to the right of the bar slides to access a hidden room.

The challenge in this home was to renovate the dated décor, stay on budget, and end up with luxurious, open, and clean lines. The home's great architectural features were the focus: floor-to-ceiling bay windows, upscale millwork, and high ceilings. All were repaired and painted in a soft white, with contrasting silver gray walls. Polished silver hardware and lighting replaced tarnished metals, adding sparkle and contrast.

This floor plan was tailored to fit a narrow lot. Multiple peaks and interesting roof lines greet guests at the street side, where a pergola over the front door provides a warm welcome to the unique design. The kitchen includes an oversized island designed for gatherings of family and friends, and the great room has a natural fireplace. The upper level features a master suite, two bedrooms, and access to a third-floor loft.

This 3,500-square-foot farmhouse underwent a full exterior restoration. A historic rendering, completed in the late 1800s, was inspiration for the restoration. All existing siding and trim were removed and replaced, and the porch was extended around the home, expanding views. The horse barn and carriage house are connected by a 100-foot breezeway. The property, now called "Old Magnolia Farm," is a stunning American farmhouse and equestrian estate.
